4. The relationship between the CTDI values must be checked. If there is a significant difference between the CTDI values of the two detectors, it may indicate a problem with one of the detectors or a measurement error. CTDI variability has been addressed in previous sections or can be found elsewhere. In addition, CTDI values must be checked to ensure that they are consistent with the expected values. It would be unusual to find a significant difference between the CTDI values of two detectors or detectors of different manufacturers. If such a difference is found, it may indicate a problem with one of the detectors or a measurement error.
