Surrebuttal Testimony of Joel McNutt

1           A.    No. Staff recommended a CCOS study be done in this rate case because, in 2 several of the Company's districts, a CCOS had not been conducted before. The Company
3 conducted a CCOS study in this case to ensure that rates in the respective districts were 4 appropriate and fair given the differences in district size, geography, and cost to serve.

5           Q.    Does Staff recommend applying the results of either the Company's CCOS
6 study or Staff's CCOS study directly to rate design for the purposes of this rate case?

7           A.    No. Staff treats the results of any CCOS study as a guide for rate making and 8 not necessarily an exact rate design to be followed. A CCOS study attempts to capture, 9 functionalize and allocate costs among customer classes as efficiently as possible, but there 10 will always be disagreements about the analysis and therefore a CCOS cannot be seen as 11 establishing a perfect rate design. Because rate design always involves subjective judgments
12 about matters of public policy, no CCOS can completely resolve all differences in opinion 13 about the "best" way to allocate costs as a reflection of the "true" cost of service for the utility 14 and its customer classes.

15           Q.    Does that conclude your surrebuttal testimony?

16           A.    Yes.
